

INTRODUCTION

The President's Park currently consists of approximately eighteen acres surrounding the White House and is used by the president, the first family, and – on special occasions – the public. These grounds are reputedly the oldest continually maintained ornamental landscape in the United States. Various changes have been made to the White House Grounds since the completion of the building in 1800, including the addition of the Rose Garden. Discover the history of the President's Park and learn how residents of the White House have utilized this outdoor space for over two centuries.

CONTEXTUAL ESSAY

Originally, the White House Grounds consisted of approximately eighty acres selected by George Washington. The land was intended to make the President's House a self-sustaining farm with orchards, pastures, barns, and stables. However, the first presidents to reside in the White House, John Adams in 1800 and Thomas Jefferson in 1801, quickly realized that a president's life did not allow time for farming. Jefferson fenced in the grounds to about nine acres of land and greatly scaled back the idea of a full farm to a few vegetable and flower gardens alongside a fruit tree (Image 1). Later in the nineteenth century, the fences were extended to include more land. By the 1870s, the White House Grounds had grown to today's eighteen acres.

Within the current grounds lie the North Lawn (Image 2) and the South Lawn (Image 3). The smaller North Lawn contains a fountain built during Ulysses S. Grant's administration and a variety of trees including buckeyes planted by Ohio native Rutherford B. Hayes. The larger South Lawn slopes downward toward the National Mall and the Washington Monument (Image 4). The concept for the sprawling South

Lawn was created in 1935 by Frederick Law Olmsted, Jr. for President Franklin D. Roosevelt (Image 5). In the nineteenth century, the grounds also contained a vast complex of greenhouses on the west side of the White House (Image 6). However, these greenhouses were demolished in 1902 to make room for the West Wing.

A well-known view from the West Wing is the Rose Garden (Image 7). This famous garden, located to the west of the main building and adjacent to the Oval Office, did not always exist. In 1902, during renovations, First Lady Edith Roosevelt created a colonial-style garden on the site of the current Rose Garden (Image 8). Mrs. Roosevelt's vision was modified by First Lady Ellen Wilson, Woodrow Wilson's first wife (Image 9). The Wilson garden was eventually transformed into the modern Rose Garden by landscape designer Rachel Lambert Mellon for President John F. Kennedy, who wanted a place to hold outdoor ceremonies (Image 10).

Balancing the Rose Garden on the west, the Jacqueline Kennedy Garden is nestled between the East Wing and the main White House (Image 11). Its history mirrors the Rose Garden, with influences from Edith Roosevelt's (Image 12) and Ellen Wilson's gardens. Several decades later, the East Garden found new life under the direction of First Lady Jacqueline Kennedy. At the time of President Kennedy's death in 1963, however, this garden was still a work in progress, unlike the recently finished Rose Garden. To honor the efforts of Mrs. Kennedy to revitalize the White House, its gardens, and the surrounding neighborhood, President Lyndon Johnson and First Lady Lady Bird Johnson dedicated the completed East Garden to Mrs. Kennedy in April 1965 and renamed it the Jacqueline Kennedy Garden (Image 13).

The President's Park does not exist for purely ornamental reasons. Vegetable gardens have existed on the grounds since the time of Thomas Jefferson. Seed receipts from the Lincoln administration reveal an extensive list of vegetables and fruits grown on the grounds, including eggplants, cantaloupes, pumpkins, cucumbers, and rhubarb. In the twentieth century, kitchen gardens became less important with modern advancement in food production. However, during World Wars I and II, “victory gardens” – small vegetable gardens meant to supplement food rations – were planted at the White House. In 2009, First Lady Michelle Obama revived the vegetable garden to teach children about eating healthy, fresh food (Image 14).

Along with planting flowers and vegetables, presidents and their families also use the White House Grounds for recreation and entertainment. Since Theodore Roosevelt’s administration, the President’s Park has had a tennis court on the South Lawn (Image 15). More recently, the tennis court was renovated so that it can be converted into a basketball court (Image 16). Presidents have also played horseshoes (Image 17) or enjoyed swimming in the outdoor pool, built in 1975 for President Gerald R. Ford (Image 18). Additionally, first families have hosted garden parties and elaborate State Dinners on the grounds of the White House. For example, President Dwight Eisenhower and First Lady Mamie Eisenhower honored wounded soldiers at a garden party in 1953 (Image 19). Finally, the White House Grounds are also used for festive events like the Easter Egg Roll and the National Christmas Tree lighting.

The White House Grounds vary greatly from George Washington’s original vision of a large farm. That original President’s Park of around eighty acres still exists as a legal entity, but many of those acres are filled by streets and public buildings, including Lafayette Park, the Treasury Building Grounds, the Eisenhower Executive Office Building Grounds, the Ellipse, Sherman Plaza, and the First Division Monument. The President’s Park is an official national park, overseen and maintained by the National Park Service. While the area is appreciated by the first family, the White House Grounds also bring great enjoyment to everyday citizen.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHERS

- Assign students one of the buildings or monuments located in the historic President's Park, outside the White House fence. Students can research the history of that structure and its connections to the White House and the presidency. They can present their findings in an essay or poster board presentation.
- President Rutherford B. Hayes was born in Ohio. He chose to plant the Ohio state tree, the buckeye, on the North Lawn of the White House. Have students research their state's flower and/or tree.
 - Take the activity another step by having students research whether that tree or flower would grow well in the climate of Washington, D.C. Compare and contrast the plants that grow well in Washington, D.C., versus where your school is located. How are the two climates different?
- Vegetable gardens have been grown on and off on the White House Grounds since Thomas Jefferson's presidency (1801-1809). For a class science project, grow a small box garden on the windowsill of your classroom or see if you can start a school garden on the grounds of the school. Have students research what plants work best for your area, and design a layout for the box or garden.
